were huddled inside or behind the temple.

The Associated Press reported that scores of women, children, and soldiers ran down the highway, some with flaming napalm clinging to their bodies. One little girl ripped clothing off and ran naked, and a South Vietnamese husband carried his nursing wife away from the destruction. AP said soldiers were reported lying along the highway, their brothers burned.

As Sgt Hao was talking, a woman with a baby wandered onto the ground in front of the house and asked if he knew where she could find the rest of her family.

Commander Introduced

Sgt Hai talked to her for a moment, then introduced reporters to his company commander.

"I've been in the army six years," said the lieutenant, declining to give his name. "In all that time I never saw planes dropping napalm on my own positions."

He said the decision to call in the air strikes was made on the weekend and that "we will drive them out in a day or two," he predicted.

Road Is Important

The line of vehicles approaching Trang Bang indicated the road's importance. "I've been waiting for three days," said a truck driver who carries bananas and cash roots each day from here to Saigon.

An old man in an old French-built Citroen limousine said he was driving to Tay Ninh, an important provincial capital 35 miles further up the road, to claim the body of his son, a South Vietnamese lieutenant killed in a battle several days ago.

"What can we think, that's war," said the father sitting numbly in the back seat of his car.

Much War Seen

"We have seen so much of war," said his daughter, showing a telegram notifying the family that her brother was missing. "We don't have any feelings anymore."

A few miles away, U.S. Navy jets gracefully arched over their targets — no one knew quite what — dropping 500-pound bombs.

The Navy strike lasted 30 minutes and provided some diversion for the crowds. They cheered and pointed at their while waiting to get past the "welcome visitors" sign into Trang Bang.
